The rise of Makerspaces closely follows the Maker movement in which physical or virtual communities of artisans, hobbyists and tinkerers build or alter items and often publicly share their original designs or “hacks” to existing products. Duluth MakerSpace cooperative members have access to 3-D printers, metal- and wood-working tools, welders, a plasma cutter, craft and art supplies, industrial sewing and embroidery equipment, plus electronics soldering and a hot-air rework station. Evening and weekend classes on everything from Arduino programming to woodworking teach attendees safety, proper tool techniques and sometimes provide the inspiration for new design ideas.
